Technical Field The present invention is directed to a simple lightweight structural composite structure and a method for producing the same. More particularly, the present invention is directed to a simple lightweight, large-scale structural composite structure for use in a wide variety of different applications, particularly in the transportation industry. The structural composite structure disclosed herein is particularly suitable for use in a railroad coupler. 2. Background Information The need for a lightweight, strong structural material such as steel is well known, particularly in the transportation industry. However, there are several drawbacks that detract from the use of structural steel. The time and cost of producing structural steel are substantial. A typical structural steel beam or girder is quite heavy and requires a substantial amount of time for its fabrication. Once the steel beam is produced, fabrication of a railroad car and frame requires the utilization of a substantial amount of labor and, often times, the purchase of special tools and equipment, such as the use of derricks and boats. Thus, railroad cars are constructed utilizing approximately one hundred pounds of structural steel for each ton of rail car. In addition, the cost of producing a typical steel beam or girder is quite substantial. Not only are the raw materials quite expensive, but the process for producing structural steel is expensive due to the amount of labor required. For example, a typical beam fabricated utilizing a mill requires the manual labor of at least several hundred people for an eight hour shift. Further, the fabrication of a typical steel beam or girder requires the use of relatively clean, filtered air to prevent severe health problems in the workers. Additionally, the fabrication process often produces noxious and hazardous fumes. Thus, the fabrication of steel beams or girders has been extremely hazardous to the workers involved. Moreover, the melting and solidifying of steel is a very energy intensive process. Furthermore, the use of a great quantity of energy is often required for heating the molten steel to a desired temperature. Accordingly, there exists a need in the industry for a lightweight, strong structure that can be fabricated at a cost less than, or at least equal to, structural steel, and which can also be produced without as many of the health and safety hazards involved with the use of structural steel
